FORUMS WHERE TECHNOCRACY IS DISCUSSED:

Probably the most active discussion site on the internet currently (2012) is the Facebook site also listed above 'Technocracy Revolution' http://www.facebook.com/groups/2205039391/

Statement Of The Social Objective Of The Technocracy technate design: March 1933 one of the first public documents from the newly formed group Technocracy Inc.

Technocracy's survey of the economic situation in America and in the world, leads to the assumption of an imminent and progressive social instability under Price System operations, with corresponding social disorder that will threaten large portions of the people with decreasing purchasing power and consequently, increasing hardship and deprivation.

Technocracy believes that in order to avoid the consequences of such a debacle it is imperative to organize a disciplined body which will resist the forces of disruption and insure the free flow of food and other necessities to the population at large during the time of crisis and afterward in the period of readjustment.
Technocracy believes that once the present order has demonstrated its operational incapacity it will be the function of its engineers and technologists to put into operation a permanent productive and distributive system which will harness the energy resources of the country for the mutual benefit of the entire population on a continent wide basis. The term "technologists" is used in the broadest sense and includes, as well as scientists and engineers, educators and experts in such other departments of human activity as are functionally necessary for the operation of the social mechanism.
Technocracy believes that the free and independent spirit of the American people will not be satisfied with the irrational assumptions of Communism, or with the hollow mockery of Fascism, and that a large measure of anarchy and disorder may be avoided by adherence to a program consistent with American tradition. Technocracy is unconditionally opposed to and will struggle against such subversive and revolutionary systems and any attempt to place this country under a dictatorship in whatever guise.
Technocracy stands ready with a plan to salvage American civilization, if and when democracy as now functioning can no longer cope with the inherent disruptive forces.
Technocracy believes that the substitution of technologists in place of politicians and profiteers will be demanded by the people, sick unto death of the insecurity and the deprivation that are the inevitable concomitants of the present ways of doing business... that the substitution of scientific national management for the present muddling, wasteful and ineffectual political and economic set-up represents the simple and natural progression of American genius.
Technocracy is not misled by emotional optimism created by temporary palliatives. Its findings prove why no "new deal", but an entirely "new game", based upon an accurate "balanced load" method of social control is the only solution for the problems facing this continent.
The American nation was founded on the assumption that every person has a right to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." Technocracy amplifies this original intention. Today political liberty does not suffice. Possessing, as this continental area does, sufficient personnel and equipment to guarantee equality of income and security to all, Technocracy is being designed to perpetuate against all aggressors those "inalienable rights" promised the American people by the founding fathers and endemic to this continent.

"Two Intellectual Systems: Matter-energy and the Monetary Culture" (summary, by M. King Hubbert) During a 4-hour interview with Stephen B Andrews, on March 8, 1988, Dr. Hubbert handed over a copy of the following, which was the subject of a seminar he taught, or participated in, at MIT Energy Laboratory on Sept 30, 1981.

"The world's present industrial civilization is handicapped by the coexistence of two universal, overlapping, and incompatible intellectual systems: the accumulated knowledge of the last four centuries of the properties and interrelationships of matter and energy; and the associated monetary culture which has evolved from folkways of prehistoric origin.

"The first of these two systems has been responsible for the spectacular rise, principally during the last two centuries, of the present industrial system and is essential for its continuance. The second, an inheritance from the pre-scientific past, operates by rules of its own having little in common with those of the matter-energy system. Nevertheless, the monetary system, by means of a loose coupling, exercises a general control over the matter-energy system upon which it is superimposed.

"Despite their inherent incompatibilities, these two systems during the last two centuries have had one fundamental characteristic in common, namely, exponential growth, which has made a reasonably stable coexistence possible.
But, for various reasons, it is impossible for the matter-energy system to sustain exponential growth for more than a few tens of doublings, and this phase is by now almost over.
The monetary system has no such constraints, and, according to one of its most fundamental rules, it must continue to grow by compound interest.
This disparity between a monetary system which continues to grow exponentially and a physical system which is unable to do so leads to an increase with time in the ratio of money to the output of the physical system.
This manifests itself as price inflation. A monetary alternative corresponding to a zero physical growth rate would be a zero interest rate. The result in either case would be large-scale financial instability."

"With such relationships in mind, a review will be made of the evolution of the world's matter-energy system culminating in the present industrial society. Questions will then be considered regarding the future:

* What are the constraints and possibilities imposed by the matter-energy system and/or how can human society be sustained at near optimum conditions?

* Will it be possible to so reform the monetary system that it can serve as a control system to achieve these results?

* If not, can an accounting and control system of a non-monetary nature be devised that would be appropriate for the management of an advanced industrial system?''

Price System Future?
"So today the operation of our control mechanism, the control measures that must and will be adopted are those that most nearly conform to the technological operating requirements of that mechanism.
These requirements can only be known by those who are intimately familiar with the technical details of that mechanism, our technically trained personnel;

- though prior to there being a general recognition of this fact we expect to witness performances on the part of our educators, economists, and sociologists, lawyers, politicians, and businessmen that will parallel the performances of all the witch doctors of preceding ages." End quote. Technocracy Study Course

'The injection of monetary concepts into all discussions of natural wealth and income, wholly confuses the people as to the actual issues at stake. Furthermore, it serves as a handy screen behind which, with a little word juggling, the business/political operators of this Price System can continue their profitable activities without being too greatly embarrassed by outside interference.' --- Howard Scott.

It is a misconception to imagine that social change will come first and that 'good' men will then be able to get busy afterward. If the so-called 'good' men and women of America don't get busy and accomplish something now, in preparation for social change, they won't even be able to accomplish their own survival afterward.
Social change can be accompanied by social violence, unless we are prepared to avert it.
Fire, famine, disease, battle, murder and sudden death do not spare the 'good'. They go down first while the tough, alert, unscrupulous and lucky survive.
It is not written anywhere that Santa Claus is going to pass out the Technate on a silver platter, while all the 'good' men and women of America sit comfortably on their collective social brains waiting for an auspicious time to 'accomplish something of importance. THE TIME IS NOW!

What has to be done is strictly educational in character.
We don't have to venture forth into the unknown. All we have to do is study and propagate that which is already known.
The Design of the Technate is the synthesis of the American social problem. It was not dreamed up out of subjective introspection. It arises out of the technological nature of American culture. The schematic form of the Technate is already decided. It was inherent in the data. It will work only in one way and that way has been determined by physical laws. Thus, the Technate projects, in advance, its own policy of organization, administration and control.
All this has been uncovered from a study of the elements of the problem. It has been accomplished. The spade work is done.

What remains to be accomplished is of the highest importance. It is to PREPARE — PREPARE — PREPARE! That is what Technocracy is doing. Technocracy is neither causing nor advocating social change. It is preparing for the inevitable, so that North America may progress to that higher form of culture that is the only alternative to the hell of social fascism.

Which do you want, American fascism or American technology? There is literally no other choice.
